
📌 CURRENT ISSUE — Volume 8 Issue 2 – 2014

Gunter, Barrie and Dickinson, Roger (Eds) - News Media in the Arab World: A Study of 10 Arab and Muslim Countries, Bloomsbury, New York and London, 2013, pp. 208, ISBN 978-1-4411-7466-6

Reviewed by Saba Bebawi - Swinburne University, Melbourne, Australia

News Media in the Arab World: A Study of 10 Arab and Muslim Countries is an edited collection that looks into the historical development of mainstream news media in 10 Arab countries. This book provides snapshots of their media systems, highlighting the issues and challenges facing news media in each of these countries.

In the introduction chapter, the editors Barrie Gunter and Roger Dickinson discuss how the media landscape in the Arab region has changed as a result of new media technologies. They state that there is an existing disjunction between these technologies, such as TV satellite television and internet, and the 'realities of Arab politics and societies' (11). This is an important point in relation to the flourishing of satellite television channels and the expansive use of social media witnessed during the 'Arab Spring' protests, yet the realities on the ground – such as government censorship – do not assist in fulfilling the promises that such technologies bring.

Another major point is that there are as there are disparities in media usage between various Arab countries, to assume that the Arab world is uniform is problematic. Along these lines, the authors discuss the challenges to establishing an effective pan-Arab identity, which include having a distinct Arab news culture that is different to that of Western news styles and reporting, the social divisions and rewards available to journalists in addition to the varying social and political status of men and women in the Arab world. It is necessary to take into account these ongoing challenges in order to successfully address the development of a pan-Arab news identity.

The book starts off with an historic account of the various media systems in the Gulf countries in which the authors of this chapter, Khalid Al-Jaber and Barrie Gunter, provide an overview of the Kuwaiti, Qatari, Emarati, Bahraini, Omani and Saudi press. Although brief, this overview provides an understanding of how the media systems evolved in these countries. The chapter goes on to look into the historic emergence of radio, television, and national news agencies, outlining its promoters and challenges. This chapter is an example of how this book addresses gaps in the literature on parts of the Arab world which are under researched. Although it only gives a brief account of the media environment in the GCC countries, it serves to offer an historic and current understanding of news media in this important economic hub.

The chapter on news in Iraq, is another example of how this book addresses parts of the Middle East that have not been extensively researched due to the political turmoil experienced Iraq within during the past two decades. Ahmed Al-Rawi and Barrie Gunter include an analysis of 857 election news stories, thus providing a considerable sample study. The study highlights what the authors call a 'disappointing reality' of the Iraqi media environment. They point out that media outlets, and in turn their journalists, are dependent on political sponsors. As a result, each media outlet in Iraq performs journalistic allegiance to the political voice sponsoring it. This study is a welcome addition to the literature due to its importance in shedding light on the media in Iraq and offers a somber account of the media environment there.

In another chapter, Zaki Hasan Nuseibeh and Roger Dickinson discuss the emergence and development of Palestinian media. They argue that the media there continue to thrive and develop despite the restrictions and limitations they have operated within. And just like their people, Palestinian media are not free. This chapter offers an historic account looking at the media in Palestine since the Ottoman empire, through to the British Mandate and on to its operation under Israeli occupation and the Palestinian authority. It is mainly useful because of its inclusion of a study on the penetration and use of the internet in Palestine. It also explains how news media have been used politically by different factions and for what purposes, which sheds further light on the use of political communication by Palestinians.

Although Egypt has been in the spotlight recently, its inclusion as a case study in this book is necessary. Hamza Mohammed and Barrie Gunter describe the media systems and developments and how they operate in relation to the political systems at play. The authors look into the changes in Egyptian media systems as a result of the recent political upheavals, and the challenges that arise as a result. Like other chapters, this chapter goes through the development of the Egyptian press historically from the periods of Nasser's rule, through Sadat and on to Mubarak. It also covers recent developments of the media under the military council's rule. New media has specifically played an important role in Egyptian politics recently, which has also grabbed international attention. This chapter looks into the use of new media from 1993 to the rise of an Egyptian virtual society and its impact on the public agenda. The relationship between bloggers and established media is also discussed, and the authors point out that initially the relationship between the two was 'toxic', but later developed to a more cooperative association, noting that this is because the virtual society could not be silenced.

The last of the case studies addressed in this book is that of Libya where Mokhtar Elareshi and Julian Mathews discuss the Libyan media environment with a focus on the emergence of new media and its role in the recent political changes. Specifically, the authors look into patterns of news consumption in Libya. This detailed study highlights 'the importance of perceptions of the credibility of news sources for news consumers and their news consumption' (219). Such a study is significant not only as a Libyan case study, but also as a useful methodological approach.

Overall, the merit in this book lies in its ability to provide an up-to-date overview of the media in the Arab world, taking into account the recent changes brought about by the Arab Spring and the prominence of the use of new media throughout the recent protests. In addition, the case studies on troubled areas in the region such as Iraq and Palestine, provide an insight into the workings of the media systems there which are usually silent in the literature. The editors and the authors offer the reader a better understanding of how the media systems differ in each Arab country, stressing that the media in the Arab world is not homogenous but rather that it needs to be addressed on a case-by-case basis.

About the reviewer

Dr. Saba Bebawi is a journalism and media lecturer and researcher at Swinburne University in Melbourne. Her research interests relate to the role of media in democracy building, and media power. She holds a PhD on the topic of international news and alternative representation from the University of Melbourne, an MA research on media policy for community radio from Queensland University of Technology (QUT), and an MA in Communications from Monash University. Dr. Bebawi has practical experience as both a broadcast and print journalist within Australia and internationally since 1995. She has previously held academic positions at Monash University in Australia and Zayed University in the UAE.

Email: sbebawi@swin.edu.au